CO-OPERATION IS MORE THAN WORK NOW— IT'S A WAR NECESSITY!

The Tutorian

LET'S CO-OPERATE BY STAYING ON THE JOB EVERY DAY!

VOLUME XVIII, NUMBER 19 GREENSBORO, NORTH CAROLINA, FRIDAY, MAY 18, 1945 FOUR PAGES

WASHINGTON SNAPSHOTS

BY JAMES PRESTON

Convinced that the end of the war will mean more jobs and a big demand for new products, American inventors and businessmen are swamping the Patent Office with applications for patents and requests for printed copies of patents already issued . . .

The rate of application for patents is nearly 20 per cent higher than it was last year. In 1944 the number of patents granted was about 45 per cent below the peak reached in 1932. The slump was blamed partly on the depression, partly on court decisions unfavorable to patent holders, and partly on the preoccupation of industry and inventors with war work . . .

To Improve Procedure

Contributing to the rapid rise in patent applications is the fact that forward-looking members of Congress have introduced bills to improve patent procedure, and have created a national atmosphere more favorable to invention. GI's on duty in foreign areas also have contributed to interest in patents by their versatility in improvising tools and implements of war, in addition to all sorts of gadgets for their own comfort . . .

On the theory that "patents encourage invention, and invention makes jobs," some of these wartime inventors are expected to play an important part in peacetime production. If their battlefront inventions prove valuable after the war, some of them probably will become manufacturers and may say, like many "boys of '18," "I've got my captain working for me now".

Larger Staff

There is considerable demand for an increase in the present staff of the Patent Office. With the number of examiners two-thirds of the normal amount on account of the war, the work proceeds at a rate that means two or three years between application for a patent and final issuance of the document. Since examiners must hold degrees in both engineering and law, officials fear it will be hard to find recruits unless the government raises salaries.

Our Seventh

Do we need to be "sold" on supporting the Seventh War Bond Drive? Do we need to be told again that U. S. War Bonds are the safest investment in the world? Must we be reminded that saving today's wages will help control inflation and provide for those post-war luxuries?

No! We know that the biggest object of this war loan is to bring back our men and women as soon as that is possible. We know that proper equipment, on time, will save lives that are dear to us.

Too many of our men have died or been seriously wounded, too many homes have been broken up "for the duration", too many little ones are praying each night for "Daddy" or "Uncle Joe" for us to forget what this greater war in the Pacific means.

So let us buckle down, tighen our belts, do without, and work every day we can till final victory arrives and our boys come home.

Industrial Management

No group of people in the United States have been subject to more criticism during the past ten years than those whose duty and responsibility it has been to manage American industrial enterprises. The questions may be well asked, "What is the attitude of industrial management and what do they want?"

We do not claim to speak for industrial management, but knowing intimately a great number of that group, we do feel that we are familiar with their ideas and viewpoints.

We believe that it is highly important that the average citizen, whether he be worker, farmer, tradesman, or politician, look upon industrial management in the light of human beings rather than something separate and apart from regular American citizens. In fact, it is essential for the public in appraising industrial management to use the Golden Rule as a guide.

The fact is that those who are a part of industrial management have the same type of impulses, motives, honesty, integrity and the same type of ambitions as other normal, energetic American citizens.

We are not saying that there are no bad industrialists any more than any other group can claim that there are no bad members in their group. We are saying, however, that the motives of men who make up industrial management are as high as any other group in this nation.

Furthermore, we can say without fear of successful contradiction that their interest in the rank and file of American citizens is as sincere as is that of any other group in the nation.

Again we come back to the importance of realizing that industrial management is made up of human beings. As a whole, these human beings have been both energetic and ambitious. They are no different from other human beings who are energetic and ambitious. They are striving to be successful and to measure up adequately to their responsibilities. By so doing they are commiting no sin any more so than does any other citizen who wants to be successful.

To judge all industrial management by the actions of a few in a minority group is no more right and just than to judge all merchants, all farmers and all workers by a few bad ones in their respective groups.

During the past ten years or more many who have been most critical of industrial management would not want to be judged as they have been judging others. It is our opinion that industrial management is sincerely committed to fairness to all those with whom it deals—the worker, the stockholder and the public. Its obligations is to operate efficiently and economically. Industrial management realizes that it cannot successfully meet its obligation unless it does deal fairly with the worker, the stockholder and the public. To neglect any one of the three would sooner or later cause failure.

Much has been written and said about the accomplishments of industrial management under our free enterprise system, and today even many, who in the past in one way or another have advocated the abolition of free enterprise, are at least paying lip service to its preservation and to the preservation of at least a partially free industrial management. In other words, it is now evident that the United States wants to continue a nation of free enterprise. Whether it can continue to do so depends in part upon whether individuals in this country can apply the Golden Rule toward their relationship and attitude toward industry and its management.

In the postwar era, which we hope will shortly arrive, industrial management is faced with a huge job. Its job will be greater than ever before in the history of the nation. International problems will introduce more problems to American industry than ever before. It is now quite clear that in order for industrial management to measure up and by so doing best serve the worker, the stockholder and the public, it must operate more intelligently and more efficiently than ever before. It must by factual determination so operate its plants as to preserve a satisfactory position in the competitive markets. If it fails, not only will the stockholders suffer, but the standard of living for its employees and for the general public will assuredly fall. It is to the best interest of all in this country not to generally condemn industrial management nor to throw political or other impediments in its way during the period following this war. This nation will fare far better in the end if industrial management is encouraged to meet the complicated challenges of the times. Again we want to emphasize the need of recognizing the personnel of industrial management as human beings who are trying to make a success of their undertakings. They should be condemned for errors of judgment or for mistakes to no greater extent than should any other individual be so condemned. They are just as entitled to the application of the Golden Rule as are any other American citizens.

In thinking of management give a little thought to what you, yourself, would do if you were in management's place.
